LAW 165. Commercial Law: UCC. 3-4 Credit Hours.

With global specialization, trade is essential for life. Contracts must be concluded, goods shipped, and payments received. Much US trade law derives from the Uniform Commercial Code (UCC) which you met in your Contracts course. This course includes selected topics in Article 2 (sales), Article 3 (negotiable instruments), Article 4A (payment orders), Article 5 (letters of credit), and Article 7 (bills of lading). More than half of the course will examine the largely independent life of Article 9 (secured transactions) which among other virtues helps soothe the fears of parties sending money and goods into the unknown. This is a unique, rigorous, assignment-based, online, asynchronous course centered on approximately three hours of weekly session videos which open each Friday morning, preceded by detailed class prep assignments due midnight Thursday, and followed by wider-ranging post-video assignments due Tuesdays. Save for the 3-hour multiple-choice final exam proctored in-person at Miami Law the course could be taken from anywhere on earth with an appropriate Internet connection. Since assignments begin immediately, the course cannot be added after Classes Begin without written permission. You must complete all first eight course assignments to continue in the course.

LAW 550. Urbanization, Capitalism, and Development. 3 Credit Hours.

The course examines the origins, types and characteristics of cities as they evolve in history, from antiquity to modern times. The role of the medieval city as loci and vehicle for the emergence of modern capitalism is emphasized. The historical review follows the successive cycles of capitalism accumulation-from the fifteenth to the twentieth centuries-and the evolving character of cities during each. The focus then shifts to the morphology and class structure of industrial and post industrial cities in the advanced world and the counterpart characteristics and roles of cities in the less developed world, with particular emphasis on Latin America, sub-Saharan Africa, and the Middle East. Two special topics will receive attention: a) The character and significance of the urban informal economy in advanced and less developed nations. b) The emergence and role of new global cities, with a focus on Miami, Dubai and Singapore. Students in this course will learn to go beyond surface appearances in order to identify key features of cities, including the distribution of the population in urban space and the role of cities as centers for capital accumulation and simultaneously, as sites for human living.

Provides a broad, historical overview of the legal systems of both ancient Greece and Rome. The focus of the course falls upon articulating the chief attributes of two very different legal frameworks from the ancient Mediterranean world: Greek law was primarily 'procedural' in nature, that is, concentrated above all on questions of process, jurisdiction, and the like, whereas Roman law was 'substantive,' considering inter alia rights, obligations, and offenses. In considering these differences, the course treats some of the most famous figures in the ancient canon—including Lysias, Demosthenes, and Cicero—as well as a range of legal topics from criminal law to family law, contracts, and delicts.

LAW 620. The Wire Seminar. 2 Credit Hours.

The WIRE was a path-breaking television series which focused on the lived experiences of both police and suspects in Baltimore's war on drugs. The show will be used to provide a context for an interdisciplinary exploration of the criminal justice system in urban areas. This will include a discussion about the drug war itself, its history, its costs, and its role in mass incarceration. The WIRE drama will also provide backdrop for discussions about stop and frisk campaigns, structural inequality in inner-city schools, police use of deadly force and generally the "difference race makes in our criminal justice system" particularly in urban areas. Readings will include court opinions, as well as material drawn from history, sociology, and critical theory. Evaluation in this discussion-based class will be based on class participation (one-third of the grade), and a paper.

LAW 641. Constitutional Crisis Seminar. 2 Credit Hours.

The United States currently faces widespread and intense challenges to our constitutional checks and balances: While courts and scholars have wrestled with the expansion of executive powers and worried about Congressional delegation of its legislative powers, the current administration has taken these challenges to new levels. Today we see unprecedented assertions of executive power, including powers to ignore statutes, impound funds and cancel signed contracts, shutter executive departments, fire independent officials, and make highly creative invocations of emergency authority. Behind many of these are Constitutional claims for the power of the “unitary executive” and (although much remains to be seen) an alleged executive authority to ignore federal judicial orders. Complicating matters is Congressional silence, if not paralysis, in the face of executive power grabs, and an historic dependence on often unwritten constitutional and statutory norms that have been cast aside. This seminar will look at the legal system’s ongoing reaction to this massive reordering of federal power and individual constitutional rights, with a focus on the legal systems’ reaction to current controversies. In addition to placing current events in historical context, we will look at the theoretical and structural constitutional causes for the crisis and what we might do to prevent a repetition or undo its most malign effects. We will examine how the legal system, primarily the courts, but also other institutions such as the bar and civil society, have reacted to these new challenges, and what law and legal theory has to offer as to their causes and perhaps cures.

How vigorously can a criminal defense attorney represent the interests of his client without crossing the line? When has a prosecutor become vindictive in his pursuit of a conviction? Is the judge just a referee who calls balls and strikes, or does the judge have a role in meting out justice? Studying actual cases and debating hypothetical scenarios, we will tackle the cutting edge issues that lawyers inevitably confront: the duty to disclose evidence favorable to the adversary, calling a witness the attorney does not believe, impeaching a witness the attorney knows is telling the truth, and getting paid, without getting indicted. In this advanced survey of the criminal process, we will reconcile the tension between tenacious advocacy and ethical (if not moral) constraints as we question the very premise of our justice system and the role of the attorney.

Prerequisite: Criminal Procedure and Substantive Criminal Law.

Litigation Skills II: Criminal Litigation, a three credit advanced litigation skills workshop for students who have successfully completed Litigation Skills I. This in-depth workshop, taught by practicing criminal defense attorneys, will have students utilizing actual police reports, depositions and real-life fact patterns, as well as various hypotheticals. The course will cover all aspects of criminal litigation, including complex pretrial motions, developing trial strategy, jury selection, advanced persuasion techniques, use of storytelling, direct and cross examination techniques, examining expert witnesses, plea bargaining and sentencing advocacy. Students will participate in mock trials and will hear from local judges, prosecutors, and/or law enforcement officers.

Prerequisite: Litigation Skills I.

Components: EXP.

Grading: GRD.

Typically Offered: Offered by Announcement Only.

LAW 877. Litigation Skills II: Business Litigation. 3 Credit Hours.

This advanced business/civil litigation training course is for students who have successfully completed Litigation Skills I. It is taught by practicing commercial litigation attorneys. Students will be trained to litigate civil business litigation cases from the inception of a case through trial. The pre-trial phase of the course will focus on case development. Students will draft and argue motions to dismiss, draft written discovery, depose and defend fact witnesses, depose and defend expert witnesses (actual practicing accountants who are brought to class), argue motions to strike/limit expert witnesses (Daubert challenges), argue punitive damages motions, and participate in a mediation. Students will develop advanced persuasion techniques, examination techniques, and advocacy skills, and learn about ethics in the legal profession and business litigation. At the end of the course, students will be divided into teams and will prepare for, and try, a final jury trial, after which they will receive feedback from local judges and mock jurors on their performance.

In the second and third years of the program, students will focus on writing their dissertations. If the student chooses to remain in Miami during this period, the student may continue to participate in the S.J.D. seminar and audit classes and will be encouraged to participate in the intellectual life of the school. Students will receive regular assessments of their progress by their faculty advisor, and the S.J.D. Director will review these assessments annually. The faculty advisor and dissertation committee must determine that the dissertation constitutes a significant and original contribution to scholarship in the student's chosen field of law. Generally, the dissertation should be 250-300 double-spaced pages and conform to the program formatting guidelines. The expectation is that students will complete their dissertations by the end of their third year in the program.

This course operates from the premise that sports and other games are legal systems that present a rich array of legal problems, interesting in their own right and often also interesting because of their analogy to problems that arise in other contexts. Among the topics to be discussed are: (1) How should competition be structured? For example, what metrics should be used to determine a winner? How (if at all) should ties be broken? What standards should be used for eligibility (for example, in the case of transgendered and bionic athletes)? (2) How should the bounds of acceptable conduct be determined? For example, when should deception or stalling be punished, and when should they be treated as acceptable parts of the game? How should misconduct be punished? (3) What are appropriate remedies for official errors?

LAW 986. Damages in International Arbitration. 1 Credit Hour.

For most parties, the amount of damages awarded is the key to success or failure in an arbitration. Damages quantification therefore constitutes a critical part of giving effect to the parties' rights and obligations through arbitration. However, notwithstanding the importance of the damages award to the parties, damages quantification often does not receive the attention it deserves. This course addresses that inadequacy by exploring the best methods and procedures for quantifying damages in international arbitration cases.

LAW 992. Roman Law: Jurists, Corporations, and Empire Form Antiquity to Today. 3 Credit Hours.

Special Topics in Classics: ROMAN LAW: Jurists, Corporations, and Empire from Antiquity to Today investigates the history of Roman law from the time of Justinian (6th century CE) to the present. We will examine the early medieval law codes of western Europe, the development of canon law in the medieval Church, the use of Roman law by early modern empires, the laws governing corporations of all sorts, and the emergence of national law codes in modern nations across the world, among many other topics. Throughout the semester, we will pay attention not only to the details of important legal ideas, but especially to questions of how such ideas emerged, how they were put in place, and how later societies maintained, changed, or replaced them. Those considering a career in the law will have a chance to analyze the history of a singularly important legal system: Roman law has not only been the basis of legal life in countless political communities, past and present, but has indelibly shaped international law as well. Those considering other careers should feel no less welcome: we will study the history of Roman law in its many political, social, cultural, professional, religious, and economic contexts, and you will develop tools to examine the ideas and institutions of other similarly complex and fascinating traditions.
