Mission

Religion is one fundamental way humans order and discern meaning and frame identity, both collective and individual. In the study of religion, students learn what religion is; how religion both shapes and reflects culture, society, politics, and individual experience; and the multiple ways religion matters and has mattered locally and globally, from antiquity to the present. Through the examination of varied disciplinary approaches and exposure to concrete diverse cultural expressions of religion, the department fosters students' broad and deep apprehension of religion's place(s) in human experience.

Goals

The department's educational work aims to strengthen students' capacities to read carefully, question critically, communicate knowledge effectively, and apply their learning in civic engagement.

Student Learning Outcomes

- Students will attain a grasp of the basic theories and methodologies of the discipline of religious studies.
- Students will acquire broad knowledge of the role that religions play in human life and society as well as deeper knowledge in a specific area.
- Students will develop the ability to communicate their understanding of the phenomenon of religion clearly in writing.
